PREFACE.

By virtue of its name an encyclopædia offers to perform for its owner a very different service from any other sort of publication. As a work of reference it aims to be an everyday companion to the scholar, by means of which he can pursue investigations over unfamiliar ground. As "a book treating of all the various kinds of knowledge," within its covers should lie the material for a gazetteer of geography, a catalogue of authors and treatises, a calendar of events, a glossary of terms, a dictionary of biography, a hand-book of law, a register of technical formulæ, a repertory of biblical learning, a guide to arts and industries, and in fine, for a vade-mecum for each branch of human learning. Since it is impracticable to construct an encyclopædia with a sufficient number of separate articles to cover so wide a range of inquiry by a mere alphabetical arrangement of their titles, whether it will accomplish such varied services as these must depend on the index. It alone can bring under prompt observation the treasures of information which are woven into all consecutive writing as the incidents of a narrative or component parts of a system. If it be ample and faithful the inquirer will soon learn to consult it first, as the quickest way to look up the subject-matter he desires to read. With it he will find little or no embarrassment from the way in which an encyclopædia is arranged, and without it cannot know wherein his work of reference will either disappoint or reward his curiosity. The ensuing volume is an attempt to make the varied contents of the American Reprint of the Encyclopædia Britannica accessible to the student in the most expeditious manner, through all their details and also in their groupings as parts of a larger subject.

To the indexer the Britannica presents another problem than that of a consecutive treatise on a single theme, and has in it analogies to the proper cataloguing of a library. It should give not titles of articles alone, but clues to subjects and authors. Let it be remembered, also, that the labors of twelve hundred scholars, each chosen as an authority, each employing such methods of classification or system of nomenclature or style of orthography as seemed good in his own eyes, and often overlapping each other's boundaries, were to be fused together in a common scheme for investigation. Equivalent names separated as widely as Jimenes from Ximenes, as Gengis-Khan from Tchenguyz Khan, as Ouranos from Uranus; oriental and barbarian words reduced to English forms by different alphabetical expedients; statesmen, soldiers and lawyers in one place called by their patronymics and in others by unstable peerage titles; artists and heroes here mentioned by their names and there indicated by an epithet; individuals with their distinctive personality obliterated under official titles;—these and like divergences and obscurities were not to be allowed to sunder references to the same subject.

Another feature of the Britannica imposed its especial requirement upon the indexer, and, while making his work look more complicated, probably will augment the chances of an exhaustive research for the inquirer. It has through nine editions been a unique merit of this great Encyclopædia, that related topics are gathered under one comprehensive head, where they may be studied as parts of a completed unity. This plan has filled half its pages with articles rising to the size and dignity of treatises or even of systems. The critical advantages are invaluable. In literature, as everywhere, the highest talent is shown not in collecting details, but in comprehending them. A scholar puts the results of years of labor into an analysis or a classification. Break up and scatter his material, and a judgment, if not a truth, is dissipated. The writers for the Britannica do not offer to view, strewn about for the mechanical convenience of handling, the piles of stone and timber they have gathered for edification, but as built up into a structure plastic to their learning or art. Majestic events are displayed as the pivots of social and intellectual revolution. Renowned personages move in the procession of history as products of one age and renewers of another. They are immeasurably more real and significant when seen in their proper relations, than when their dislocated heads are bowled down the alphabet at chronological wickets. The same systematized treatment of literatures, of fine and industrial arts, of professional learning, of physical and metaphysical progress, has been fruitful of biographical condensation and variety. Two or three dates affixed to a name standing in an historical or analytical order, complete, in thousands of instances, intelligible sketches of the less renowned workers for human advancement,—of men not eminent enough for separate notice, not comprehensible when isolated from their times, yet worth the understanding, who for reasons of space are omitted from works of reference constructed upon the plan of multiplying articles by disjointing subjects.

The long treatises which result from the method of the Britannica are exhibited in the index under the form of Tables of Contents analytically prepared, alphabetically arranged, and placed immediately after the titles of the articles which they represent. They have usually been suffixed where the article extends over three or more pages, and each sub-division has been of compass so small as, on the average, to comprise the contents of less than half a page. To many students these Tables of Contents will prove suggestive of related lines of investigation. They have permitted the use of general terms which would be lost among specific names; they have given rise to groups of references extending through many volumes; they have brought under observation paragraphs comprising classifications and catalogues, so that, if perchance the index has failed to catch some desired detail, the means are here at hand for its easy pursuit.

In the compilation of the following volume the question has often arisen: "Should the catch-word of the index invariably be found on the page indicated?" If so, many an important passage treating incidentally of a subject would be lost because its author had failed to use a customary or expected term. On the other hand any liberal use of discretion in gathering topics under heads of the indexer's choosing would often result in his putting upon an author's language a sense which had been intentionally excluded. Obviously, a reference apparatus ought only to display the character of the book to which it is attached, whatever its defects, redundancies or excellences. Yet by a system of analyzing the more comprehensive articles into Tables of Contents, of forming hundreds of groups of general subjects, and of copious cross-referencing by equivalent terms, it is hoped that the work of this index will be found so interlaced that each catch-word will carry the thread of all important references to the same topic throughout the Encyclopædia.

In several legitimate ways this volume will be found to extend the scope of the Britannica. A writer of connected paragraphs can indulge in indefiniteness or ambiguities with some reliance upon the context to make his allusions plain. But the indexer has no context and must be precise. Hence the references in this volume will clear up obscurities in the text for many a reader uncertain of the facts. Frequently dates have been supplied to distinguish one event or personage from another. Scientists mentioned only by their surnames, public men alluded to by a mere title, individuals having the same names, have had to be distinguished by fuller appellations or epithets; different designations of the same thing to which the pages of the Encyclopædia have given no clue have been brought together. Much has been done to make specific what would otherwise be left indefinite.

Opportunity has also been taken during the compilation of this index to add therein the dates of birth and death to the names of eminent persons, chiefly American, to whom the Britannica writers have accorded only an incidental notice. The same service has been done for distinguished individuals who have died during the publication of this work, and hence have failed of separate biographical sketches therein. Especially has this improvement been carried through the List of Contributors to the Encyclopædia. By these expedients the personal contents of the work have been brought down to the latest practicable date.

While the columns of each page have been indicated by the use of a for the left and b for the right hand, the simple plan of printing these letters in Italics has been employed to denote that the subject matter of a reference occurs disconnectedly more than once in the same column, which therefore is worth reading through. Again, in all references to matter composing a subordinate part of an article the title of that article in parenthesis follows the catch-word. Frequently the parenthetical words locate the reference in a smaller division of a page than a column and help expedition. But the two chief gains by their use are that they define the character of the matter referred to, thus saving the need of qualifying phrases; and that they bring before the eye in one group all the articles of the Britannica having kindred scope, thus suggesting an examination of equivalent or related terms.

It is believed that whatever faults may be found with this volume, critical examination will pronounce it the most copious and useful apparatus for reference to the largest and most scholarly Encyclopædia extant in the English tongue.

Besides the faithful services of several reference-writers, the editor has had the assistance of Professor John P. Lamberton of Philadelphia, a gentleman long experienced in the making of books, upon the examination of sheets for the compositor and of the revised proofs.

Occasion is here taken to acknowledge valuable aid in placing the entire American Reprint Edition of the Britannica on the ground it now occupies. For six years the original text from which the Reprint has been made, as well as its own pages, has been under the constant examination of a large staff of special and general scholars, for the purpose not only of detecting discrepancies or errors of statement, but omissions of information which an American reader would regret to discover in a work of reference bought for daily use. This revision has resulted in a large number of foot-notes scattered upon the pages of every volume of the work, and these are distinguished from the matter of the original text by ending in the abbreviation AM. ED. (American Editor). With the same end in view, several hundreds of additional articles have been prepared and bound up according to their alphabetical range as supplements to different volumes of the Reprint. The names of the principal writers for these supplements may be found recorded in the List of Contributors, where each is credited with his own articles. In the work of revision and annotation the editor has received assistance from the late Pliny E. Chase of Haverford College, from Charles W. Greene, the erudite encyclopædist, from Guy Hinsdale, M.D., from John P. Lamberton, all of Philadelphia, from Rev. A. D. Heffern, now of Pittsburgh, from Rev. F. D. Hoskins, recently Warden of the Divinity School at Faribault, Minnesota, from Otis H. Kendall of the University of Pennsylvania, from Nathan Burnham Webster, formerly of Norfolk, Virginia, but more recently a coadjutor in the work of enlarging this Reprint, and from many others whose special services have been less continuous and extended. His whole undertaking has been sustained by the generous liberality of the publishers who have undeviatingly sought to make the American Reprint of the Encyclopædia Britannica of unmatched usefulness and value to the American public.
